The latest draft of the 2012 campus master plan indicates that the University of Alabama may transform the main building on the Bryce Hospital campus into a cultural arts center that will include space for museums and the performing arts.

According to the Tuscaloosa News, the university either updates or replaces its campus master plan every five years but university planner and designer Dan Wolfe said the plan is simply being updated for 2012.

The Bryce addition, along with a new aquatic center and new parking deck, were announced during a meeting last week that offered students, faculty and staff an opportunity to view the current draft and make suggestions.
